This workshop is organized in connection with the Zeuthen lectures by Professor Ernst Fehr, University of Zurich. The workshop should cover experimental, theoretical, and empirical research on how psychological principles can be used to complement or even replace standard economic assumptions of rationality and selfishness to improve the explanatory and predictive power of economic models. Papers are invited from all fields of behavioral economics, including: the nature of social preferences, the patterns of boundedly rational behavior, the role of emotions in economic decision-making, and the role of social preferences and bounded rationality for the functioning of markets, organizations and incentives. Submissions from graduate students, post.docs, and other young researchers are particularly welcome. There is no conference fee. We cover accomodation costs. Travel is at your own expense.
