Over the past few years terrorism has been a major issue for many governments. Terrorist attacks may have huge economic, social, and political implications. As a consequence, governments must put forward effective counterterrorist policies. Several reasons have suggested that the causes of terrorism are due to underdevelopment, poverty, malgovernance, and other institutional constrains. The objective of the conference is to assemble recent findings on strategies for combating terrorism that may serve as policy recommendations. We look forward to receiving papers on a variety of relevant topics, as well as different approaches, theoretical and empirical, all of them emphasizing policy implications of terrorism. Papers presented at the conference will be selected to be published in a special issue of the Journal of Policy Modeling.
